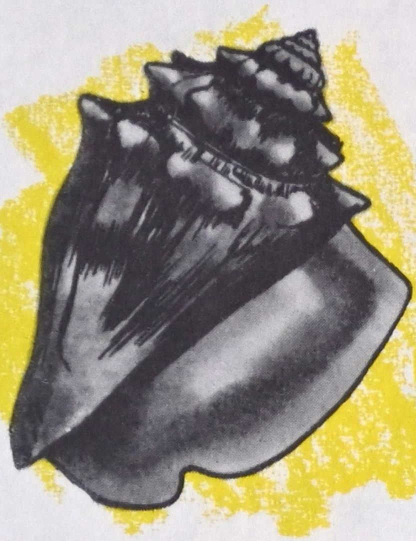
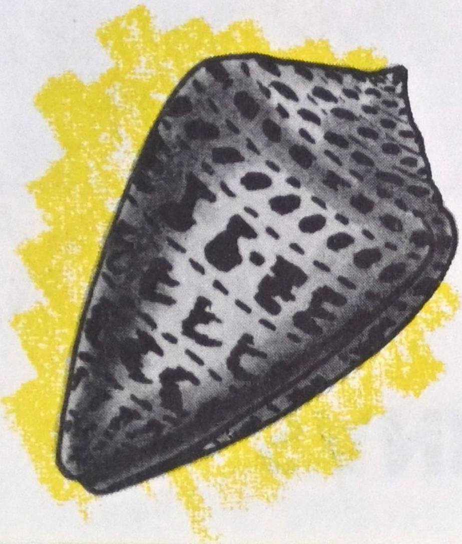
TWO COMMON SHELLS FOUND ON SANIBEL AND CAPTIVA BEACHES



FLORIDA FIGHTING CONCH

Size 3" to 4"

Latin name: Strombus Alatus. A common shell found on sandy bottoms in shallow water. They are carnivorous and scavengers, feeding on bivalves and dead fish. The Fighting Conch is found with or without spines on the shoulder of the last whorl. The shoulder of outer lip slopes slightly downward. A fairly colorful shell of dark reddish brown, often mottled orange-brown, or having zig zag bars of color on the shiny pasietal wall. The periostracum is very thin and velvety.



ALPHABET CONE

Size 2" to 3"

Latin name: Conus Spurius Atlanticus. A shell fairly common found on sand bars at low tide. Although the snail in this species is harmless, it has some relatives found around the Philippines which are poisonous. The spire of the Alphabet Cone, sometimes called the Chinese Alphabet, is slightly elevated in the center. The top of the whorls are smooth except for tiny growth lines . It is white with spiral rows of orange-yellow characters resembling Chinese letters.

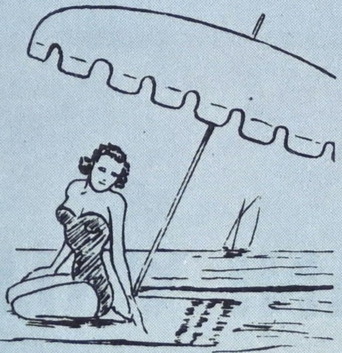
A BRIEF HISTORY OF

On sub-tropical Florida's southwest coast lie the last of the Sunshine State's unspoiled islands - - principal of these are Sanibel and Captiva. With a romantic history that dips back into the days of conquistadores and buccaneers of the Spanish Main, they were headquarters for one of the most notorious and evil of these pirates - - the infamous Jose Gaspar, better known as Gasparilla, or "Little Gaspar".

Sanibel - - supposed to have been named for Santa Isabella, or for the enamoured of one of Gaspar's lieutenants, and Captiva - - aptly named because of its stockade where captive women were held for ransom by Gasparilla. However true or untrue, it is still a romantic tale.



Sanibel and Captiva possess one of the three most famous beaches in the world - - to shellers, to fishermen, and to those who seek a secluded retreat where cares of the everyday world are discarded like a worn cloak.

At one time many fine vegetables and citrus fruit were grown on Sanibel, but a hurricane of some years past all but wiped this industry out. What little remained was given up by the discouraged growers. Even today remnants of once large citrus groves may be seen on parts of the island. Sanibel-Captiva is a bird sanctuary. Many rare and strange birds are to be found there, and many visitors go to the islands just to bird watch.

Shelling remains its principal attraction - - with fishing a close second. Though some seek out these romantic "Tahitis of the Gulf" just to laze and do nothing but vegetate in the salubrious sub-tropical climate.

Several inns and cottage colonies, with accommodations to suit the most particular, dot the islands.

In these modern days, Sanibel and Captiva Islands seem to be a place where time stopped for a little while, and is in no hurry to catch up. They are truly a sheller's paradise, a sanctuary and a haven - - not only for the birds - - but for those seeking a restful and quiet retreat from everyday cares.

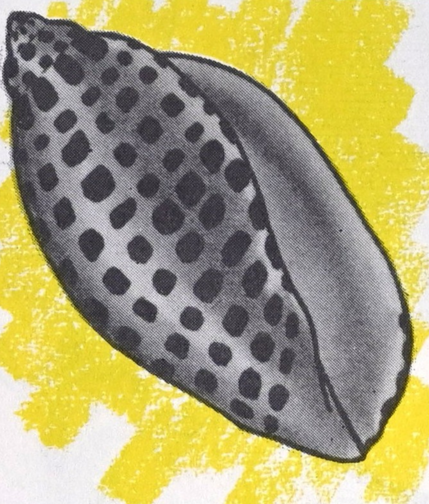
TWO RARE SHELLS FOUND ON SANIBEL AND CAPTIVA BEACHES

JUNO'S VOLUTA

Size 3" to 6"

Latin name: Scaphella Junonia. A rare shell to find on the beach, but quite numerous in one to thirty fathoms of water. Occasionally wash ashore after a Northwester. A handsome and graceful shell, rather solid and smooth. The spire of the Juno's Voluta is always prominent. The shell is characterized by its pinkish cream background color with spiral rows of reddish brown dots. Inside is a beautiful salmon pink. This shell is a prized possession for any collector.



ANGEL WING

Size 4" to 8"

Latin name: Barnea Costata. One of the more rare shells found on Sanibel and Captiva beaches. Found in sticky mud in six inches to one foot depth. Care should be exercised when digging the Angel Wing due to the razor-shaped edges on shell. This shell is moderately fragile. It is usually white, but occasional speciment of delicate pink or lavender are taken. It has thirty well developed beaded radial ribs which are scale like at the anterior end of the valve.
